“Connecting registration forms and payments was revolutionary for us.”

Yahrziet

The Problem: Registrations.

Every week, the same rhythm unfolds. You put together the newsletter—copying over event info that already lives on your website. It’s redundant, but necessary, because people still say, “I didn’t know that was happening.”

Someone RSVPs for Shabbat dinner. Great. You check the registration form... but now you need to manually cross-reference your payment system to see if they paid. For the 10th time this month. And the community seder? A beautiful moment—if only someone would sponsor extra seats. But there’s no clear place to invite that generosity.

The office inbox is a mess of emails and texts like:

“Put me down for two.”

“Can I come but pay later?”

“Did you get my check?”

The calendar on your website? It’s there—but clunky to update, not always current, and not synced with registrations. So you’re left with an Excel sheet, hoping the guest list is accurate enough to update the caterer, and that security has a clue who’s walking through the door.

Student pricing. Senior pricing. Last-minute cancellations. Sponsorships. Special accommodations. No confirmation emails. Just you, juggling it all.

And every time you consider switching to a new system, your stomach turns. You’ve done this before. You don’t want to uproot everything again.

But you also know: this is not sustainable.

The Solution, like a Mensch

EVENTSHALOM BY YAHRZIET

Simple Registrations. No learning required.

You open your laptop Monday morning, and for once—you're not buried in spreadsheets and forwarded RSVP emails. The events page on your website? Done. Updated and beautiful. Each program has a clean registration form, linked directly to secure payments, with all the details you approved.

You still have full oversight—every registration goes into a live list that only you control. You see who's paid, who hasn't, who's asked for a sponsorship, and even who needs to be flagged for security. No one slips through the cracks—but now, it's without chasing them down one by one.

When someone emails or texts you to RSVP? You forward it. One click. They're added. You still make the call—just faster.

Catering? No more last-minute scramble. You pull the updated list with a click and send it. Accurate, every time.

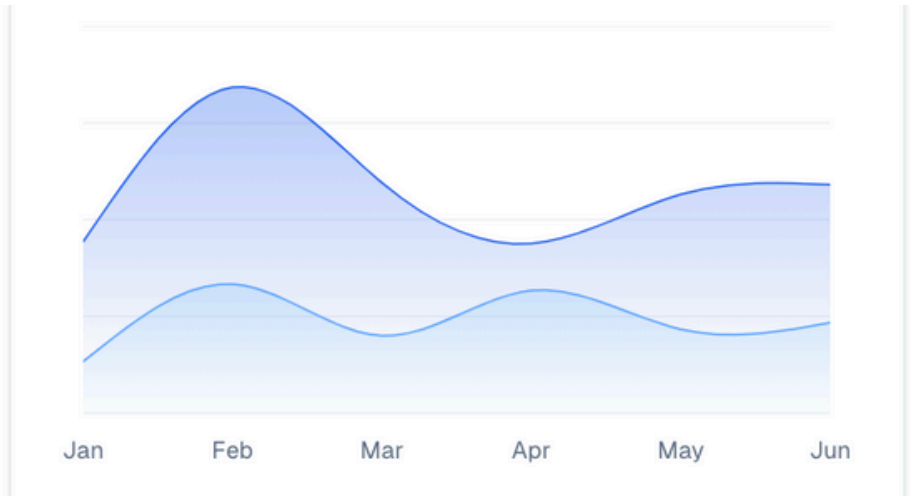

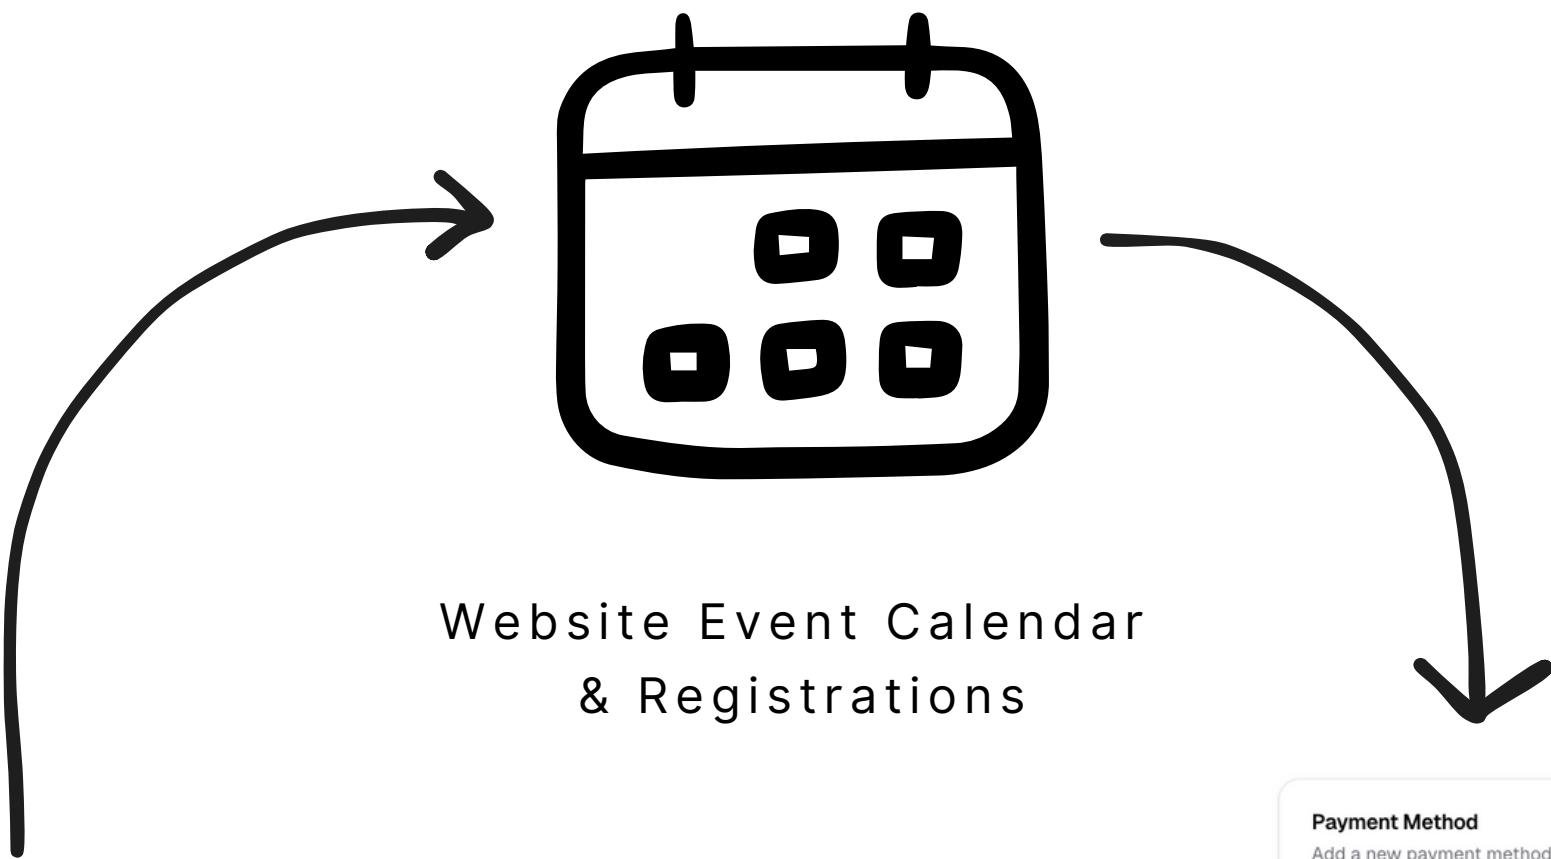

Nothing goes live without your say-so.

You're still the point person. The gatekeeper. The rock. But now, instead of juggling it all manually, you're the one who runs a clean system—and everyone knows it.

It centers you, just with fewer headaches.

Because you're not just the administrator—you're the one who makes it all happen.
